Object pronouns take the receiving end of the action, and they come after the verb or after a small word like to, for or with: give it to her, wait for them. English uses a completely different word for the same person depending on which job they are doing - she versus her, he versus him - and that is the whole difficulty.

What to expect: The most common pattern is using the object form in the subject slot: "her did it", "him is my friend". This is not laziness or a hearing problem. The object forms are more frequent in what a child hears ("give it to me", "come with us"), so they get learned first and then over-applied.
